Author's Note

It was a tradition at my primary school that the best two drawers were selected by the class to draw whiteboard visuals at the conclusion of each term, just prior to the commencement of the summer holidays. I was always one of the two.

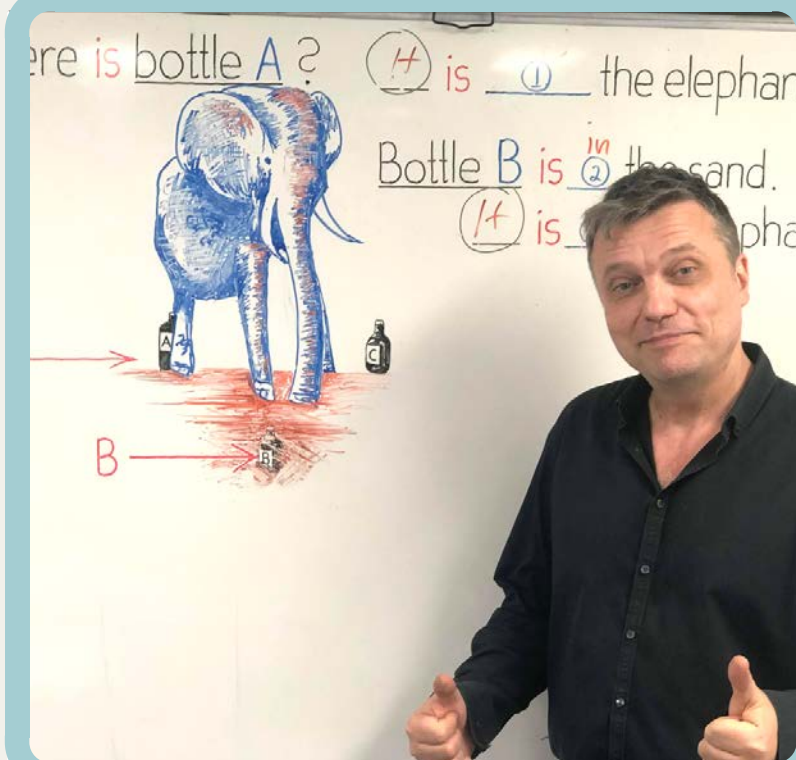

But apart from a book cover, and some illustrations for the Swedish Business Council, my flirtation with chalk, crayons, and whiteboard markers never turned into anything more serious. That was until I was recruited by English Unlimited as an English teacher. A few impulsive intuitive scribbles on the whiteboard started to take on the outlines of surprisingly advanced features.

The students clearly appreciated it. I started to enjoy it. After a Korean student bought me some multi-coloured whiteboard markers as a present, I put an even more serious effort into my whiteboard visuals. I especially enjoyed the ability to explain whatever the students couldn't understand from their text books, with my whiteboard visuals....But I also began to ask myself why the most obvious explanations were not to be found in any of the available text books.

I had even come across an Elementary student, once, who had been so confused about the grammar focus that he had tried to memorise every single word in the pages of the unit he was studying. On a separate occasion an intermediate student from Brazil had come to me with a 2 inch thick paper pile about the present perfect tense, asking me to explain it to him. I had told him to throw the papers he had in the waste paper bin. After 10 minutes I had explained to him - on the whiteboard - what he had never previously understood in his life. His 'eureka' facial expression remains imprinted in my mind to this day.

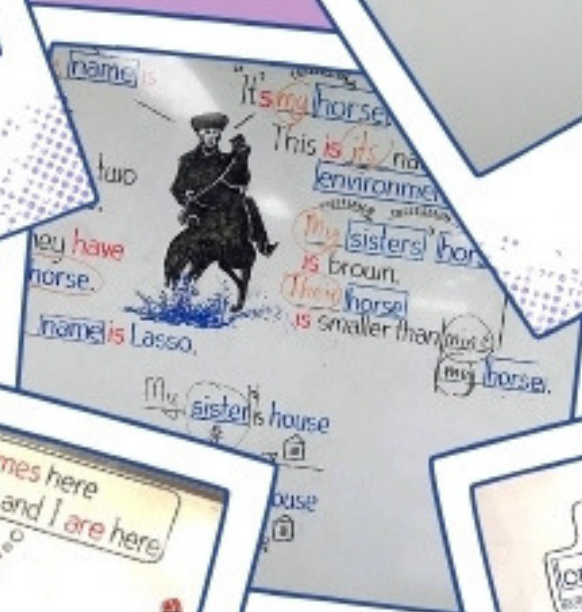

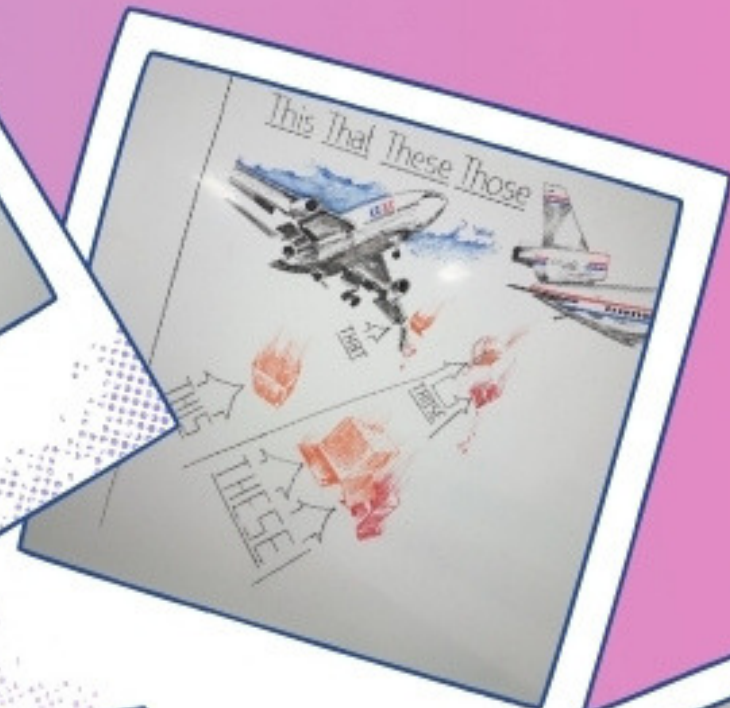

It should be pointed out that a very important factor behind the quality of my visuals is the trust & freedom this college and its management has given me to 'express myself'. Freedom prompts creativity. The idea to develop English grammar explanations into a tangible format like this book, is clearly a step in the right direction.
